Course Objectives:

The course treats ethical dilemmas that arise in the relationship of medical practice and Christian faith. The objectives of the course are that students be able to: 1) make moral analyses and decisions about biomedical issues; 2) discuss the role of the church in relation to health care professionals; 3) articulate a method of making moral decisions about biomedical issues that includes a consideration of religious faith. Assignments included reading, extensive case analysis, and a research project.

Evaluation:

XXXXX (name) has a very matter-of-fact and straightforward way of presenting his/her views, always with a touch of humor. He/She shows great skill in counseling, especially with youth who are in difficulty. He/She gave the clearest and strongest argument for truth telling in nearly all circumstances, a view that was persuasive to the class. Because of late enrollment, he/she was often behind in turning in assignments. He/She worked effectively at articulating and practicing a method of resolving biomedical moral dilemmas. His/her final paper was a well-researched study of ethical issues related to organ donation. XXXX needs to work at grammar, punctuation, referencing, and spelling. His/her overall performance for the class was very creditable.
